Museum Boat Monument Honoring Amphibious Training is Closer to Completion

The Higgins Boat currently under construction at the Gulf Unmanned facility on Airport road will be displayed at Carrabelle Beach where the training for D-Day occurred. The property is owned by the CGJA and will also be the site for the proposed new building to house the WWII Museum, pending funding from county, state and private sources.

The boat will be built to 1/2 scale; 18 feet long, 4 to 5 feet wide, will be weatherized with epoxy and painted in the correct color scheme of that time period. The ramp will be functional and the interior will be as accurate as possible. The museum was given sets of original 1942 Higgins Boat Company drawings to use for reference. LTC David Butler, USA Ret. and CGJA Board Member, was responsible for securing the drawings.

Plans call for the boat to be placed on a concrete slab with a pole barn, informational Kiosks, walking path and lighted flagpoles. Executive Secretary Michael Horvath has applied to the Florida Department of State for a grant to help fund erection of an historic marker on the front of the property where the Higgins boat will be displayed.

The construction project will be costly even though we plan to utilize prison labor when possible. Our budget is set at $50,000 and we are about $10,000 short. Anyone wishing to contribute to this monument can send a check to Camp Gordon Johnston WWII Museum, P.O. Box 1334 Carrabelle, FL 32322. Be sure to mark your check “Monument Fund” You can also contribute online through Paypal at www.campgordonjohnston.com.

Gulf Unmanned Systems Center, which tests, trains and manufactures unmanned systems, donated space at their Carrabelle facility for construction of the boat. CEO Bruce McCormick is also a 24-year Navy Veteran. The CGJA is especially grateful for his company’s generosity and his support of our project.
An extensive interview with Mr. Wallis was videotaped for the Museum family.

Mr. Wallis went to school on the GI Bill, got married and raised a and was discharged in August 1945. After his discharge, Mr. Wallis went to school to learn Morse code and become a radio operator.

During a training jump, Mr. Wallis parachuted onto Dog Island with his radio equipment. Upon landing, he fell forward and his helmet slid down over his face and broke his nose when he hit the ground. His radio equipment was damaged and was rendered useless. On a later training jump, Mr. Wallis's leg was broken in six places; that was the end of his time as a paratrooper.

After recovering from his injuries, he was transferred back to the Fourth Infantry Division during the summer of 1945 to train for the eventual invasion of Japan. The war ended before that invasion took place and he never saw combat. After being discharged from the army, Mr. Wallis attended college under the G.I. Bill and received a degree in engineering. For the next thirty-six years, he worked for General Electric, traveling to many different parts of the country.

An extensive interview with Mr. Kellbeck was videotaped for the Museum archives.

On March 7, 2015, the Camp Gordon Johnston Museum was visited by World War II veteran Hugh D. Wallis and his wife Susan. While visiting the museum, he recorded a twenty-five minute interview recounting his memories of World War II. The following is a small summary of that interview:

Mr. Wallis was born on a tobacco farm in Cadiz, Kentucky in June 1924. In April 1943, Mr. Wallis was drafted into the United States Army. After basic training, he signed up to be a paratrooper and was assigned to the 504th Parachute Infantry Regiment of the 82nd Airborne.

After completing his training, Mr. Wallis and his unit boarded a ship bound for Casablanca, Morocco. In early 1944, Mr. Wallis was sent to Italy. The 504th was the only regiment of the 82nd airborne to be deployed to Italy. The rest of the 82nd was deployed to England. While in Italy, he was sent to Anzio where he first saw combat. He was wounded in the leg by debris thrown up when a German 88mm artillery shell landed near him. Shortly thereafter, the 504th was sent to England. Because of the significant casualties suffered in Italy, the 504th was withheld from the Normandy invasion to reorganize.

On September 17, 1944 Mr. Wallis and the rest of the 504th parachuted into the Netherlands as part of Operation Market Garden—the largest airborne operation in history. One of the objectives of the mission was to seize control of several bridges near the town of Grave. Mr. Wallis was wounded in the arm while his unit was crossing the Maas-Waal Canal.

In December 1944, Mr. Wallis participated in the Battle of the Bulge where he got frostbite on his feet. Shortly after Christmas Day, he was evacuated from the front line and was sent back to the United States. He spent the remainder of the war in the U.S. and was discharged in August 1945. After his discharge, Mr. Wallis went to school on the GI Bill, got married and raised a family.

An extensive interview with Mr. Wallis was videotaped for the Museum Archives.

On February 21, 2015, the Camp Gordon Johnston Museum was visited by an army veteran who did part of his training at Camp Gordon Johnston as a paratrooper. This was his first visit back to the Camp Gordon Johnston area since 1945.

Mr. Joseph Kellbeck was born in Clifton, New Jersey. He was still in high school at the beginning of World War II. At first he joined the army reserve and was sent to engineering school under the Service Training Program at Syracuse University. After D-Day, the Service Training Program was shut down and he was sent to infantry training in Florida where he volunteered to be a paratrooper. After earning his jump wings, he was sent to radio school to learn Morse code and become a radio operator.

After training in Italy, Mr. Kellbeck parachuted onto Dog Island with his radio equipment. Upon landing, he fell forward, his helmet slid down over his face and broke his nose when he hit the ground. Also, his radio equipment was damaged and rendered useless. On a later training jump, Mr. Kellbeck's leg was broken in six places; that was the end of his time as a paratrooper.

After recovering from his injuries, he was transferred back to the Fourth Infantry Division during the summer of 1945 to train for the eventual invasion of Japan. The war ended before that invasion took place and he never saw combat. After being discharged from the army, Mr. Kellbeck attended college under the G.I. Bill and received a degree in engineering. For the next thirty-six years, he worked for General Electric, traveling to many different parts of the country.

SHOWING IN THE CAMP GORDON JOHNSTON WWII MUSEUM Movie Theatre, Saturday at 10:15 hours, April 25, 2015. Almost 40 minutes into Angelina Jolie’s “Unbroken,” a soldier named Louis Zamperini needs desperately to fall back on advice he heard in church as a boy: “Do not fear the night.” The need to keep focused in the worst of times kicks in for us, too, because that’s when this extraordinary, hard-hitting film starts to pull viewers through the wringer.

When you get through it, though, you can’t help but feel uplifted by this tough-skinned movie that can stand with the best muscular wartime dramas in the American movie canon.

Zamperini (Jack O’Connell) — or Zam, as his pal Phil (Domhnall Gleeson) calls him — is a bombardier during WWII. He’s already escaped life as a roustabout youth in Torrance, Calif., by becoming the fastest American in the 5,000-meter dash at the 1936 Berlin Olympics.

While on a rescue run over the Pacific in 1943, Zamperini’s plane has mechanical trouble and crashes into the ocean, killing the whole crew except for Louis, Phil and Mac (Finn Wittrock). They wind up adrift on a raft for 47 days, facing sharks, starvation and enemy fire, barely surviving on the few fish they catch with their bare hands and the drops of rain they catch in their mouths.

Then the lost airmen are found — but by the Japanese. That begins more than two years of nightmares at POW camps and run-ins with a sadistic young commander named Watanabe (memorably played by the Japanese pop star Miyavi).

Admission is by donation, and appreciated. This film is one in a series shown monthly to educate our visitors on the sacrifices made, for us, by our WWII generation.

Military vendors are welcome. For information, visit: www.campgordonjohnston.com or call Russell Dewitt, MVPA, 1st Florida Division, at (252) 377-1528.
